

As a consumer of digital content, I have grave concerns about the proposed Broadcast Flag.

This will require a costly retrofit of existing HDTV sets already sold.

The technology will either be expensive and onerous or quickly and easily overcome, and possibly both.

The need for this technology is dubious: if content is broadcast, then doesn't it follow that it is meant to be widely disseminated?

Hasn't this industry received enough gifts from the federal government lately?

Content production and delivery is already too tightly controlled, and there is too much big money and big political clout chasing it. Giving in to these interests relinquishes control of content to them, and further turns the FCC into a paper tiger.
